

Education Journey

Facilitation Guide

What is it?

In order to create connection and a sense of community, it is important to understand multiple perspectives and the influence of culture and lived experiences on mindsets about education.

Why use it?

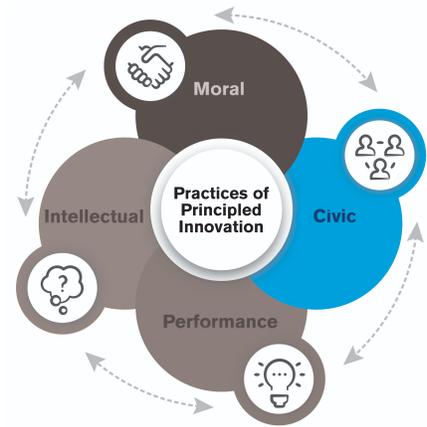

This interview activity will help us understand lived experiences and underlying preconceptions when it comes to attitudes about education.

What you need:

20-40 minutes

- The attached instructions
- 3 or more people
- Pen and notepad or paper

Education Journey

Instructions

Step 1: Share your Journey

Pair up or break into groups of three people. Each person in the group will have an opportunity to share a story about their educational journey while the others take notes.

Step 2: Interview as the person is sharing

Take turns to complete interviews of each member of your group. Using the guiding questions below, try to listen attentively and take notes in your notebook as the other person speaks.

Interview questions:

- What was your experience of learning and schooling?
- How did your family or community view education? What was their role in your education?
- Describe your philosophy of education -- what is the purpose of education? What is its value?

Step 3: Reflect

Self-reflect using the post-interview reflection questions, then discuss with a partner and share your main take-aways with the larger group.

Post-interview reflection:

- How was your experience of sharing your own perspective and listening to another person's perspective and experiences?
- Were you able to listen fully and remain open to others' perspectives?
- What were some of the differences you observed between your experiences and perspectives?
- What types of lived experiences did your partner have that shaped their perspective on education?
- Were you aware of any judgments or biases that arose for you as they were sharing?
- How has this exercise challenged your perspective on the purpose of education?
